UNDATED (AP) -- A new report says the state can do better in making sure all segments of its population have health care.

The study funded by the U-W School of Medicine and Public Health finds Wisconsin is doing well in overall health. But, it also says there are wide gaps among racial, geographic, gender and educational groups.

Wisconsin gets a 'B-minus' in overall health, but a 'D' in health disparities.

The report is based on mortality rates and surveys in which people said how many days in the past month they were physically or mentally ill.
